YOUTH THE KEYNOTE OF ART EXHIBITION

PICTURES AND SCULPTURE

Some Members of the Exhibiting Coterie Send Specimens of Each.

If you would clasp hands with youth, the MacDowell Club gallery at 108 West Fifty-fifth street and look at the work of the eight young men who display here, through the next few days, some sixty paintings and pieces of sculpture. Whether you like what they show or not, you must feel the impact of a body of men who are evidently not drifters but are pursuing their art with a rush and a

This is in itself a refreshing element. even though the paths along which they are going are not without familiar footprints here and there, the marks of the followers of Claude Monet and of the socalled post-impressionists having led the way for several of these art pilgrims.

Like others of Matisse's admirers, two contributors to this second group exhibition at the MacDowell Club send both paintings and sculpture. This may be a sign of artistic incontinence, or a proof of an art interest beyong the paricular medium chosen as one's principal means of expression—take it which way you will, there is something both vital and ingratiating in the effect of this dual incide of utterance.

One of the bilinguists is a sculptor who has been learning the language of paint; the other is a man of the brush who has taken up the modelling tools as an added outlet for his resources. The first is Arthur Lee, His sculpture is rather oddly out of key with his painting, owing perhaps to the influence of a training in the former that has made for a certain suavity, a balance of artistic forces, while the painted decorations that he sends have something of the primitive quality that is cherished by the disciples of a certain section of the post-impressionists. reaching a rawness of color in one of the flower pieces that makes the canvas fairly resound.

In the achievement of Andrew Dasburg, the other contributor of work in the two forms, there is seen the outcropping of a consistent development in His paintings have the smack of post-impressionism, and his plaste head of Lucifer, modelled with rough force and designed to set the observer's teeth on edge by its contorted visage, is the plastic equivalent of the pictures. Even the most ardent advocates of this ter of Mrs. Carsten W. Sierck, was married to Edward P. Alker, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Alphonse Alker of Great Neck, L. I., and this city, in the Advent Lutheran Church often just as mannered as any of the vicious older schools; convention is always ready to make the unwary its own. Every one of this little coterie, formed simply for this brief exhibition, displays a personality despite the influences of leaders that have gone before them. The wide angle of the lens of youth is also in evidence in the scope of their subjects. Here is one of them, Walter Henry Reeves, who paints nudes in a floral bower, a fountain in a city square, with nurse girls and babies; a warmly colored bit of outdoors showing a sand cart being loaded with its substantial burden or a studio interior with just enough of the leaven of post-impressionism in its design and treatment to make it fresh and vigorous without being freakish. Rather painty, some of this work, but in the main the result of definite ideas and a confident recording of them.

The note of confidence is after all one to be properly valued. It is found again in the pictures by Paul Rohland; it fail by sings from the handsome canvas whose theme is a nude seated comfortably on the floor and seen against a background of greens and blues. The painter was of the painter was of pale pink chiffon with pannier skirts of yellow taffeta. They wore also hats of brown velvet trimmed with small yellow feathers and carried bouquets of sunshine roses.

of greens and blues. The painter was fully persuaded, it is easy to see, not only of the beauty and interest of his subject but of his own powers of conveying these to the observer. The last touch of conviction is imparted by the line was easy to be the conviction of the last touch of conviction is imparted by the tiny red stone in the ring worn on the model's right hand.

Had the treatment here been any less sure, this might have been either affected or ineffective instead of what it is, frankly amusing, in just the way the painter must have intended. The placing and modelling of this nude are engaging.

The picture is a little insistent but it is The picture is a little insistent, but it is none the worse for its genuine vigor and self-assertion. Seen across the large gallery it takes its place as a canvas of distinct power.

From the same artist have come other pictures not to be overlooked. One of them, "Sand Dunes," a harmony of greens and grays, never sickly in color, is un-usually well composed, the pattern being obtained by looking down from a height upon the landscape, which takes the form f a roughly circular design in its central theme. I For color that is both vita! and refined look at one of Oliver Chaffee's still life themes, the one with fruit and a table, with flowers stuck into an open coffee pot. This warm, glowing piece of painting has a touch of aristocracy in its choice of color notes. Not all of this painter's work shown here reaches this level. But a man is entitled to be placed on the plane of his best achievement. plane of his best achievement.

When one looks at work like that of donn H. Alger, with its heavy dots or strokes of pure color, it is easy to see that the Monet tradition has not passed too far into the background amid the clamor of newer methods to command the allegiance of the new generation. Mr. ciance of the new generation. Mr. repaints with perhaps too consistent flowing of this manner, but it results rat times in this little group of his in records worth setting down and sant to see. Walter H. Frankl and less Lennox Wright are the other lers of this second of the MacDowell groups. Neither is a seeker for lity in rhethod of utterance, but his a point of view, and Mr. Frankl, the little in the second of the macDowell cally in his "Peasant House," has something agreeable, even beautiful. Less MacDowell Club shows are open be public on every day from 10 to 6, dding Sundays, but excepting Monand Tuesdays.

HISTORIC PAINTING-HERE.

St. John Kneller Has It in Fifth Avenue Gallery.

Although not on public exhibition a painting of historic interest, "The Holy Family," ascribed to Franceis Chauveau, of the time of Louis XIV., painted on vellum in distemper, has come to light and is in the possession of St. John Kneller, a descendant of Gotfees Kneller, the English scendant of Godfrey Kneller, the English Portrait painter.

This picture is in the collection of a Fifth avenue art gallery, where it has been left by the owner, St. John Kneiler of Atlantic

The painting came to me as a legacy from England," said Mr. Kneller in speak-ing of the work, "and with the inscription 'Painted by François Chauveau, time Louis XIV.; given to Baron Brune by Louis XVIII. out of his boudoir in the Tuileries.'

"It came into the possession of my grand father," said Mr. Kneller, "about the time of Napoleon's escape from Elba, when many prominent Frenchmen took refuge in England, and he, being an intimate of in England, and he, being an intimate of the French court, entertained many of them at Kneller Hall, England.

"There is one painting by Lebrun in the Louvre," he continued, "much resembling it, and another in the Dresden Callery, recently attributed to Lebrun, but they differ in detail, and neither is as beautiful in color or finish as mine.

"Chauveau and Lebrun were contemporaneous and did much work jointly. They decorated the palaces of Versailles, and the Tuileries on the order of Louis XIV, and Chauveau probably reproduced the work of Lebrun in miniature for Louis XIV,'s boudoir, lor it may have been the other way.

AIV.'s boudoir or it may have been the other way.

"I have only once submitted it to an expert," said Mr. Kneller, "and that was some years ago, to my friend the late William Laffan, former owner of The New York Sun, and I did not then care to part with it. He pronounced it undoubtedly a work of the period claimed (Louis XIV.) and one of the linest specimens he had ever seen. It was evidently retouched, as he said, about a century ago, as some of the high lights have oxidized, a fault which developed in many works of that period.

"The work is not signed, which Mr. Laffan said was decidedly in its favor, as neither is the work in the Dresden Gallery signed."

signed."
In conclusion Mr. Kneller said that he would add with reference to Chauveau that the artist had a great reputation as an etcher, and if one examines this painting minutely with a glass he will recognize the methods of the etcher in the drawing.
